Our goal is to help clients understand the market by reducing it to simple-to-understand concepts. We respect simplicity because that is clarity at its best. We think "Keep it Simple Stupid" is a profound statement about our mentorship program.

What you need for our webcast

You need a PC with sound and latest Internet browser, a reliable Internet connectivity and client logon details, which we provide. It is that simple. Microphone is optional.

How to approach investing in stock market

There are three categories (three basic types) of market participants:

1. Traders, who focus their activity on the intraday and/or short-term trend – day traders or income-oriented.
2. Speculators, who focus on the intermediate trend, taking market positions and holding them for weeks to months.
3. Investors, who deal mainly with the long-term trend, and hold their positions from months to years.

How do you identify yourself?

The true secret

There is no one theory or technique holding the secret to investment success. This is the flaw of most investment books and training courses. The true secret is the combination of technical and fundamental analysis, with a healthy sprinkling of probabilities and risk management.

Investing (trading) is a game of probabilities. Your goal, as a market participant, is to maximize your probability of success on each trade, while simultaneously optimizing your risk/reward on that trade.

Basic technical analysis has its greatest value in that it provides a method of measuring the tendency of the market to react in a particular way under similar conditions throughout history.

What market tools you need?

In stock market, you need a solid, intuitive tool to formulate strategy and tactics. Well-placed loss-cuts (hedging via options or leveraged ETFs) are invaluable tools. You need to master the use of the little known INSURANCE instrument, called Options, in the stock market.

Indicators such as Stochastic and MACD are marvellous tools, but they are not always right. Moving averages are often worth their weight in gold. What would we do without TrendLines - Resistance and Support Levels? Lately Linear Channels have been doing a good job in describing trends and trend reversals, producing market turn signals.

Under any conditions, you cannot expect your predictions to be correct most of the time. What you need is to develop approaches that will help you suppress the adverse effects of the times you are wrong and exploit the positive effects of times you are lucky enough to guess right. That is called strategy and tactics. That is called money handling. That is where we can help your vision!
